Through this event, we hope to shape the discourse, challenge the status quo, and promote a business landscape that values diversity and value-driven practices.

Together, we can steer the course toward a more inclusive and sustainable business environment, empowering women-owned businesses and advancing the principles of ESG and BBBEE in South Africa

Moody's Ratings Roundtable Empowering Diversity
Advancing Women Owned Businesses through ESG and BBBEE Strategies

Empowering women business owners with Moody's Foundation partner WEConnect International.

Building on more than five years of partnership, Moody's and WEConnect International recently launched a series of boot camps focused on business sustainability to help growth-oriented businesswomen break into new markets.

Investing in our communities:
The Moody's Foundation and WEConnect International's longstanding relationship supports women entrepreneurs in emerging markets by sharing Moody's research and employees' subject matter expertise through pro bono volunteering activities and facilitating virtual training sessions.

In addition to the boot camps, each year, we run a joint virtual training program called "Financing your Growing Business", designed to help growth-oriented businesswomen break into new markets while expanding the mission and vision of their business.

In July 2024, Moody's and WEConnect International hosted a joint two-day ESG business boot camp in South Africa called "Building ESG Capacity for Sustainable Growth". This event brought together 30 women business owners and gave them the opportunity to learn more about ESG best practices and ways they can make their operations more sustainable. Throughout the event, Moody's employee volunteers facilitated workshops on topics such as ESG risk, credit ratings, business sustainability in partnership with representatives from WEConnect.

Celebrating success:
One participant, Zanele's Choice Spices, was successfully able to expand their business following their founder's participation in our 2023 ESG capacity-building workshop, by incorporating the "Junior Chef Spice Box" into their existing product line.

Third, our view is that the post-pandemic shift towards more flexible work arrangements, especially remote working, has acted as a significant pull factor into the labour market. Firms had to quickly adapt to working from home arrangements at the height of the pandemic. While the removal of mobility restrictions in 2021 has brought most people back into the workplace, several companies have decided to permanently switch to hybrid or remote work. As of early 2024, around 30% of paid days were worked at home in the U.S., compared with less than 10% prior to the pandemic (see Chart 5).

This move towards more flexible working conditions is expected to have opened doors for some women, pulling participants into the labour market. Certain age groups are at the forefront of this shift. Women balancing career growth with early family life—the ones represented in the 30-34 age group in Chart 7 take centre stage, as working from home has allowed them to hold a job while caring for children. Crucially, women in this age cohort are likely also facing more acute financial pressures such as dealing with childcare and housing—a further motivation to look for a remote job amidst a cost of living crisis.

CHART 10: MANAGEMENT GENDER GAPS NARROWING IN KEY SECTORS

Conclusion
There is still enormous work that must be done to achieve gender parity in the labour market. At this stage, reaching the UN Sustainable Development Goal for gender equality by 2030 is clearly beyond reach. Nonetheless, small steps have been achieved that are also helping deliver higher economic prosperity across the globe. A silver lining of the havoc wreaked by the COVID-19 pandemic may be a permanent shift in attitudes towards working that paves the way for more women to actively engage with the labour market. However, job quality is at least as important as job quantity. Accelerating the pace in which gender gaps in full-time, senior-level positions are narrowing will unlock economic potential at individual and macroeconomic levels.
